

Winston Churchill's Speech

I am speaking to you today from the beaches of Normandy, standing in front of an army of heroes. I am here to announce that in the early hours of the morning a vast amount of our brave allied troops swept onto the beaches of Normandy; we are in France. This liberating event has been planned extensively over the past few months. We are supremely confident that this will bring about a change to Europe, that is required to defeat the evil Hitler. We are now here, with a foothold in France, ready to march forward.

The thanks our nation can offer you know no limits; you will return home as heroes. You, the courageous troops and men, who are so close to us all, have shown excellent patriotism and as a result we have made much progress in beginning the end of the world war. We shall prove ourselves as a great country, a powerful country and a successful country. We will forever be remembered for liberating Europe. I have full confidence that the British Empire, along with their allies, can defeat Nazi Germany.
